3. Program description

The diversity of students in higher education is a reality today. Students with different cultures, from different geographies, with different learning profiles or with disabilities are all part of the student population. In this challenging scenario, it is important for university teachers to become increasingly competent and promote more and better learning with a focus on the academic success of ALL students. To this aim, it is essential to empower them with the conceptual tools and operational resources to manage an inclusive lesson that responds to the needs of the diversity of students in a class.

4. Objectives

This course aims to promote the training of higher education teachers in the area of inclusive education. Its goals are: To promote understanding of inclusive education from the perspective of human rights, equity and participation; To provide knowledge of the principles and application of Universal Design for Learning; To promote knowledge of pedagogical differentiation; To encourage the implementation of curricular accommodations and pedagogical differentiation in the classroom; To foster the transformation of the organization of the teaching-learning process; To develop habits of cooperative reflection on teaching practice.
